Crack-up looks at the other wing of neoliberals, libertarians, who sometimes embraced secessionist tendencies, calling for a complete exit from the state to zones within and outside countries that did not adhere to national regulations, levied almost no taxes, and in some instances, allowed capitalists to make up their own rules. In some cases, these ideas also coexisted with openly racist and white majoritarian tendencies. These zones were highly prized by the colonial era as

"one nation, two systems" in the case of Hong Kong after it became a part of China, to "one nation, many systems" in the case of Dubai, where each zone has a unique set of rules. Besides, zones followed what historian Kojo Koram, quoting Aimé Césaire, calls the "boomerang effect". Experiments begun in the peripheries of empires were brought back to the heartland. So, though the story begins in Hong Kong, the last major British colonial possession, it also looks at how the zone was replicated
